Scholars are becoming increasingly aware that studying linguistic and communicational phenomena from single perspectives is at best only scratching the surfaces of the richness and complexity of the processes involved. We are in dire need of balanced INTERdisciplinary endeavours. Although a small number of current book series pay lip service to such concerns, the promises cumulatively reflect the diversity of approaches available are nonetheless restricted by existing disciplinary boundaries. Edited volumes are similarly fated by their multidisciplinary faces rather than their interdisciplinary souls. We therefore announce a series which is truly interdisciplinary in data, theory and methodology. Such a Series will provide an important forum for forming and testing hypotheses dealing with the interrelationships between individuals, speech communities, social and cultural systems, language attitudes and communicative behaviours. Hence, included in this series will be empirical and naturalistic studies which will elaborate the linkages between linguistics, sociology, psychology, philosophy, social anthropology, communication science, socio-legal spheres, etc.

The editors welcome book proposals and manuscripts from scholars who are working on language and communication problems which promote and integrate multi-perspective and interdisciplinary study.

FAMILY COMMUNICATION

Dorothy KRUEGER

Many scholars agree that communication contributes to the differences between successful and unsuccessful relationships. Few, however, have cogently described those aspects of communication accounting for relational differences, or explained how communication influences relational satisfaction. This volume synthesises the current theory and research on family communication, and incorporating the author's insights, describes communication strategies and patterns family members develop, and explains how these affect intermember affiliation.

In each chapter the discussion includes AND INTEGRATES relevant material from several disciplines as well as non-Western sources; for example, historical and anthropological background information, sociological data, and material on cognitive and behavioural aspects of the phenomenon under consideration.

The book highlights the role of communication in relationship development, conjoint decision making, family conflict resolution, child rearing and sex role socialisation, as well as other family-related issues.

Contents: 1. Introduction; 2. Self and Family; 3. Forming Intimate Bonds; 4. The Family as a System; 5. Family Communication Strategies and Patterns; 6. Creating Reality in the Family; 7. Family Roles; 8. Parenting; 9. Troubled Families; 10. Improving Family Communication.
